The impact of recent educational advances on the treatment of internal carotid artery occlusive disease. The percutaneous management of carotid artery disease has expanded and improved in the past decade. Such intervention may be considered to address symptoms, prevent stroke, or both. Although the risk of stroke after carotid artery revascularization is decreasing, the cost is high, and many centers still have a reluctance to perform it. More rapid and effective revascularization can be obtained with percutaneous transluminal angioplasty and stenting. There is now evidence that carotid artery stenting reduces the long-term rate of ipsilateral stroke and the rate of restenosis compared to endarterectomy. The choice of revascularization for individual patients is therefore a matter of clinical judgment and should be based on the natural history of carotid disease, its symptoms, the degree and duration of the stenosis, and the risk of stroke and restenosis.
